

Published based on Reasonable Internet Safety Strategies For Active Parents

Reasonable Internet Safety Strategies For Active Parents

In the past few years it seems that kids are born computer literate. They know precisely how to work the computer while their parents who more often than not did not grow up with computers struggle along. But parents need to know where their children are and where they are going and this is truer than ever on the Internet.

We have all heard the stories on the newscast about Internet predators and how easy it is for them to masquerade as something that they are not in order to tempt children. The Internet is a notable place to bury your identity and look to be something that you are not. This is a threat to everybody but children and young people are above all at risk.

Internet predators can be a menace to our children but unfortunately kids and young people can also be at threat from their own peers. Cyberbullying is reaching rampant proportions. There are websites out there promoting precarious lifestyles and sexting is also on the rise. We need to educate our children to use common intelligence when they are on the Internet.

As a parent it is your task to be on familiar terms with as much about the Internet as your kids do. If you are not as familiar with being online as they are then you need to find out whatever you have to so you can catch up. You are liable for protecting the safety of your children so you need to know where they are going and what they are doing particularly online. You can learn how to verify browsing history or how to use monitoring software so that you are an informed parent.

Email can be another concern. You may want to share an email account with your child until they attain a precise level of maturity. Most parents have rules about certain things like dating; there should be rules about email usage also. You can monitor incoming emails and delete objectionable spam if you split an email and after your child becomes conscientious enough to deal with it then maybe they can get their own email address.

Social networking sites are the rage right now. Your kids may inform you that it is not cool for parents to be hanging around on Myspace, Facebook, Twitter and more but you ought to have an account anywhere they have an account. You need to be conscientiously aware of what is going on and where your kids are playing just like you would be if they were at the neighborhood park. Another thing to be concerned about is that cyberbullying can become so harmful and pervasive because we don't disconnect and unplug. Both you and your kids need to have a life outside of the Internet and unplug and get away from it often.

There are a number of Internet monitoring software programs that you can install that will allow you to track all Internet activity, including messaging, websites visited and even chat room exchanges. You can be careful about this but if you are conscious you can diffuse potentially risky interactions before they get out of hand.

The Internet is a great tool that can instruct us and help us to grow but if it is abused or not monitored it can swiftly become a dangerous risk. You watched your child and you've done everything you could to keep them protected, you need to continue that caution with the Internet.

Visit baby website for more information on your child's online safety. I also own grocery coupons to save on your family's grocery bills.

Find valuable information in the topic of heirloom organic seeds - this is your personal knowledge pack.

You can also find this article published on Reasonable Internet Safety Strategies For Active Parents