Computers Can Be So Freaking Frustrating!

In this day and age, computers are everywhere and run almost everything. We rely on them in our personal lives, our work lives, our social lives..... absolutely everywhere. They keep our schedules, run our businesses, handle our accounting, hold our music, pictures and important documents, give us access to the internet, tv shows, videos, blogs and on and on and on. We absolutely love our computers (most of the time) and live and die by them (practically). So why are they so darn annoying?

All we want is for our computer to come on and work the way we expect it to and do what we ask of it. I mean, really, it's not rocket science! We just want to check some e-mail or type a report or listen to some music or play a game or surf the web or whatever. But we want to do it without all the crashes and error messages and popups and the like. "Plug and Play" should mean "Plug and Play" not "Plug and Pray" but they still haven't gotten that quite right yet, have they?

I mean Microsoft with all of it's updates.... why couldn't they just get it right the first time (they've been doing it long enough). Every other day, your computer reboots itself and then tells you "That a very important security update was installed." Are you kidding me? Just look at how many versions of Windows there are: Windows 3.1, Windows 3.11, Windows 98, Windows 2000... and on and on and on. And then you have the Home and Professional editions and even Ultimate (with Vista... they must have meant ultimate annoyance). Should we all just really buy a whole new machine? And all of these ridiculous, flamboyant drivers and programs that HP installs with your printer that bomb or crash 70% of the time. Whatever happened to the good old days when you just told your computer that you had an HP laserjet 4 and the driver was installed and that was it? You never heard from the printer or it's driver ever again. You simply told the computer to print whatever you wanted printed and that was it.

Well, here's the good news. It's really not that bad.... If you're a guru... like me. But, If you, like most people, are not a guru and are tied to your computer and can't live without it but are tired of all the little bumps in the road that annoy you and keep you from being as productive as you can.... finally there's a solution. You can go to the "Computers Can Be So Annoying" blog and post your messages, thoughts, comments, suggestions and I will answer any and all questions that you have. So no more fumbling around in the dark and no more endless searches for the answer to that annoying little bug. I am here to help you.

And here is your very first tip. There is a wonderful company that can fix most of your computer problems remotely! That's right ! No more wasting hours on the phone with so called "Tech Support" being frustrated trying to understand the complicated instructions or taking your whole system apart and lugging it to the nearest repair shop. Nope. If you can get on the internet, then, more than likely they can help you. Give them a try.
